There's no way around it. This is a sad story. There's no happy ending. It's a story of poor people making the best of their circumstances. By the end of the century, such schools had become commonplace, a product of the social reform movement. Lancaster, Massachusetts, opened in 1854, the Industrial School for Girls at $2500. The Industrial School for Girls at Lancaster, Massachusetts, opened in 1854, and fathered two more children. Harrison Town died in 1894 and is buried in Rural Cemetery in Belchertown with his first wife, who had been supported by the town's care and fathered two more children. Mary was older than Julia by a couple of years. With a child on the way, Mary married David Lemon of Ludlow in 1858. The infant died. The couple had three more children, though, before Lommon joined the Union Army in August of 1862. Within three months of his enlistment, two more of his children had died in Belchertown. David was discharged for disability in 1865. Another child would be stillborn before David Lemon, himself, passed away in 1875. Only two of the couple's children survived. Mary remarried in 1877 and had one more child, Harry Asher Chapin, who would, ironically, manage the Greenfield town poor farm. Lucy, younger than Julia by about seven years, had a child out of wedlock in 1863 of whom nothing more is known after 1865. Lucy married in 1867 to David Towell, a spinner in a woolen mill in Holyoke, where the couple lived for a time. The marriage lasted 35 years until David's death in 1902, but apparently they had no children together. Emily Town, the wayward sibling who spent part of her youth in reform school, seems to have led a relatively normal, if short, adult life. She apparently returned to Willington to marry Solomon Haskell of Coventry, Rhode Island, in 1864. The couple then moved to Providence and raised two boys to adulthood before she passed away in 1892 at age 46. Ironically, her body lies in the Storrs Cemetery in Mansfield—the same cemetery where her sister’s murderer was buried in 1916, having outlived them all.
